Art brings colour to hospital

ARTWORKS inspired by life on Wearside are helping to illuminate a life-saving city hospital ward.

By DAVID ALLISON
david.allison@northeast-press.co.uk
Twitter: @davidallison88

Artist Ray Bradshaw is almost as well known in the city's NHS as Dave McNicholas, who now manages the Integrated Critical Care Unit at Sunderland Royal Hospital, where some of Ray's paintings will now be on display.

Ray has worked in various NHS roles for 38 years – at the Royal in A&E as a staff nurse, at the old Royal Infirmary, as a district nurse, and latterly with the city's Primary Care Trust.

After leaving Thornhill School, he took a job at Cherry Knowle Hospital when he was 17 and his career in nursing began.

As nurses, Ray and Dave have known each other since those early days.

Dave ended up visiting an exhibition of Ray's work last year and asked hospital trust bosses if they could buy some of his paintings to brighten up the unit.

"I taught Dave all he knows as he was one of my students when he started in nursing," said Ray, 59, of Moor-side in Sunderland.

"My various roles often brought me back to the Royal, so I hope the images produce a smile and some light relief for those who see them."

Pieces by Ray now featuring on the ward include his take on Sunderland's seafront as well as a scene of a typical night out.

"I've done a lot of work which is based on the North East," added Ray, who admits his style is often "humorous" in tone.

"When Dave came along to my exhibition in Washington last year he mentioned that he'd like to use some of my prints in the unit and I was delighted.

"To put art up is a totally different approach to when I was in nursing, but it's been nice to come back and see how things have moved on."
